This version of the Child Support Table Lookup (viewing online) is based on updated Federal Child Support tables that took effect on November 22, 2017. You can use it to calculate a child support amount for a period of time from that date. Use the 2011 Child Support Table Look up to calculate a child support amount for a period before that date. This child support table look-up will help you find the base amount of child support. Read the Step-by-Step Guide and the Table Lookup Disclaimer for more details. The Guide provides instructions and worksheets that will help explain how to calculate child support amounts. It also has information about special or exceptional expenses that may need to be added to the basic child support amount. You may want to ask a lawyer for advice on your situation. The base amount is often not the final child support amount to be paid. For example, if there are special expenses such as childcare or if you share custody, the amount is likely to be different. Under the Federal Child Support Guidelines, the table amount is determined by: Enter the following information: Table search disclaimer The Child Support table lookup has only general information. Date Changed: 2020-08-07 Our free California child support calculator is based on the formula used by all courtrooms in California and is published in family law statutes. The support figure this calculator generates is commonly referred to as guideline and is typically what a courtroom will use to determine your monthly payment. A skilled lawyer could argue that this amount is either raised or lowered depending on the situation. California's public policy is that a parent's first and most important responsibility is to support their child. It doesn't matter... Timeshare, defined as the amount of time the kids spend with their parents, is one of the most important factors used... Knowing your rights or obligations regarding child support is extremely important before submitting for divorce. Learning why support is offered, how long it will be paid, and exactly how much will be provided will help you be better prepared for what to expect. What is Child Support? California public policy is that a parent's first and most important responsibility is to support their child. It doesn't matter if you're a mother or a father, if you're the middle of a divorce, or have never been married to the other parent. If you have traditionally stayed at home to care for your child, or historically historically primary financial support in your former relationship, it doesn't matter. This obligation is mutual and important. What is the purpose of child support? A mother and father's first and most important obligation is to support their child. The child support obligation is mutual, based on ability and each parent's income and time with the child. The child's best interest is key. California's child support guidelines are designed to reduce conflict and reduce litigation. California law presumes the parent who has primary parenting time already carries a significant proportion of his or her resources for the care and support of the child. However, this suspicion can be re-tried. How long will I pay or receive child support? The general rule is that child support will cease once they are 18 years old and graduate from high school. How much child support will be ordered? Child support in California is calculated using a complex algebraic formula under specific and uniform guidelines. In general, we look at two factors when determining child support: parents' income and timeshare. The purpose of uniform state guidelines is to enable uniformity in the calculation of child support. There are a number of approved software programs like DissoMaster, X-Spouse and SupportTax designed to help with calculating child support. In implementing the statewide uniform guideline for child support, the courts must adhere to the following principles:(a) A parent's first and principal obligation is to support his or her minor children according to the parent's circumstances and station in life. (b) Both parents are mutually responsible for supporting their children. (c) The guideline takes into account each parent's actual income and level of responsibility for the children. (d) Every parent must, according to his or her ability, pay for the support of the children. (e) The guideline seeks to place the interests of children as the state's top priority. (f) Children must share in the standard of living of both parents. Child support can therefore appropriately improve the standard of living of the custodian household to improve the lives of the children. (g) Child support orders in cases where both parents have high levels of responsibility for the children should reflect the increased costs of raise the children in two homes and should reduce significant differences in the children's standards of living in the two homes. (h) The financial needs of the children must be met as much as possible by private financial resources. (i) It is thought that a parent who has primary physical responsibility for the children contributes a significant proportion of available resources for the support of the children. (j) The guideline seeks to address equitable and effective settlements of conflicts between parents encourage and seek to reduce the need for litigation. (k) The guideline is intended to correct in all cases, and only under special circumstances if child support orders under the child support mandate fall through the guideline formula. (l) Child support orders must ensure that children actually receive fair, timely and adequate support that reflects the state's high standard of living and high cost of living to raise children compared to other countries. Child support orders are legally binding documents that oblige a non-custody parent to provide monthly financial support for his or her child/ers. In California, there's a statewide formula used to calculate the amount of child support a non-custody parent owes a custodian parent. The child support formula takes into account how much money each parent makes, additional income that either parent may receive, how much children need support, how much time each parent spends with his or her child/ers, health insurance expenses, day care expenses and additional information you can learn from www.courts.ca.gov. If you have a child support order in place but struggle to raise the support you are entitled to, it is important to discuss your situation with your Local Child Support Agency (LCSA). The LCSA could help enforce child support orders even if the non-custody parent lives in a different condition. Some of the options available for enforcing a child support order include: Wage Garnishment Intercept income tax returns, unemployment benefits, workers' compensation benefits, lottery winners and other forms of state aid licenses suspension (i.e. hunting license, professional license, driver's license, etc.) Passport Denials Other options for enforcing child support may also be available. Talk to your LCSA or include the help of a lawyer to help you raise the money you need to support your child. These calculators take into account the California child support guidelines to give you accurate estimates of child support in places like San Diego, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento and elsewhere throughout the state. In California, child support is calculated with a very complex algebraic formula that takes into account the parents' income, each parent's time with the child and any tax deductions available to any parent. This formula is applied when supporting a minor child should be determined, including decompositions, pattern and domestic partnership cases. UNDERSTAND THE CHILD SUPPORT GUIDELINES Purposes of the Guideline There are two purposes for the guideline: (1) To provide for a minimum minimum of child support for a child and (2) To provide for uniformity in the calculation of child support. In order to achieve these purposes, the guideline requires judges to follow its terms, with deviations allowed only in limited and specified situations. Underlying principles The guideline act begins by emancipation of the principles to be followed in its implementation. Among those principles are this: A parent's first and main obligation is to support his or her minor children according to the parent's circumstances and station in life. Both parents are mutually responsible for supporting their children. The guideline is intended to be presumably correct in all cases, and only under special circumstances child support orders must fall under the child support mandate through the guideline formula. Child support orders should ensure children actually receive fair, timely and adequate support that reflects the state's high standard of living and high cost of living compared to other states. Application of the guideline The guideline itself is a very complex algebraic formula. The actual formula is detailed in full in the Annexure at the end of this article. Due to the complexity of the formula, computer programs are required so that quick and accurate calculations can be obtained. By far the most widely used program is DissoMaster®, which can be found on the following site: Determining the child support guideline for a child, the following information must be obtained: The gross income of each parent. The percentage of time each child spends with each parent. Any available income tax deductions the parents can claim, such as mortgage interest. Mandatory payroll deductions, such as health insurance, pensions and union dues. Childcare costs incurred by either parent. Once this basic information is inserted into the DissoMaster or other support calculation program, a guideline child support amount is generated. Examples The following are examples of how the child support guideline is applied in different factual situations. Note that in most of the examples, if the parents are married or in a domestic partnership, the higher income earner could be ordered to pay spousal support to the other parent, in addition to guideline child support. How that spousal support will be calculated is beyond the scope of this article. Example 1 Facts: The father earns $7,000 a month and the mother earns $3,000 a month. There are two minor children and the father has them 30% of the time. Each parent deducted $100 a month from their salaries for health insurance. Both parents have monthly mortgage interest payments of $1,200 and property taxes of $200 a month. Support: Father mother $1,268 a month. Example 2: Facts: Same income, deductions, and payments as in Example 1. However, the parents share the time with the children. Children. Father pays mother $609 a month. Example 3: Facts: Father earns $7,000 a month and mom earns $5,500 a month. Same deductions and payments as in Example 1. Father has the children 40% of the time. Support: Father pays mother $548 a month Example 4: Facts: Father earns $7,000 a month and mother is unemployed. Father has the children 25% of the time. Same deductions and payments as in Example 2. Support: Father pays mother $1,914 a month Departures From the Guideline Amount California Family Code §4057(a) stating that the guideline amount of child support, as determined by the formula, is thought to be the correct amount of child support to be ordered. This means that the judge is required to command the guideline level of child support unless there is a good reason why another amount of child support will be appropriate. In creating the child support guideline, the California legislature understood that there could be situations when the mechanical application of the guideline would not be fair or reasonable. Family Code §4057(b) contains a list of factors that, if present, can justify a judge's decision to allocate child support that is higher or lower than the amount generated by the guideline formula. Among those factors are the following: The parent who is ordered to pay child support has an unusually high income and the amount determined under the formula will exceed the needs of the children. A parent party does not contribute to the needs of the children at a level consistent with that parent's custody time. Cases in which both parents have significantly equal time to share some of the children and one parent have a much lower or higher percentage of income used for housing than the other parent. Cases in which the children have special medical or other needs that may require child support that will be greater than the formula amount. In addition to the basic child support guideline amount, a parent can be ordered to contribute to specified expenses that benefit the children. Family Code §4062 lists two types of child support add-ons. Compulsory additions: The judge must recommend a contribution to the following as additional child support: (1) Childcare costs associated with employment or to fairly necessary education or training for employment skills; and (2) The reasonable uninsured healthcare costs for the children. Discretionary additions: The judge may also order a parent to contribute to: (1) Costs associated with the educational or other special needs of the children; and (2) Travel expenses for visiting. (This appears to refer only to travel expenses incurred by the custodian.) If the judge makes orders for any child support additions, any such expenses are usually shared equally by the parents. Where an equal allocation of however, expenses are not reasonable, the court is authorised to allocate them between the parents in relation to their net disposable income. Income. Code §4061(b) provides that the following three-step procedure must be followed to determine the parents' respective net disposable income for purposes of assigning the child support add-on: Step One: The guideline child support amount must be calculated. Step Two: The amount of guideline child support is deducted from the income of the paying parent, but not added to the income of the receiving parent. Step Three: If one parent pays spousal support to the other parent, the amount of spousal support should be deducted from the income of the paying parent and added to the income of the receiving parent. Step Four: Calculate the father's percentage of the parents' combined income and apply that percentage to the add-on. For example, in Example 1, above, if the father was ordered to pay spousal support of $487 a month to the mother and the mother has a monthly childcare cost of $800, the proportional part is that expense calculated as follows: Step One: The father's guideline child support was calculated to be $1,268. Step Two: Subtracting the guideline child support from the father's income results in a difference of $5,732. Step Three: Subtracting the spousal support of $487 from the father's net income and adding that to the mother's income results in net income of $5,245 for father and $3,487 for mother, for a total combined net income of $8,732. Step Four: Father's percentage is 66% of the total combined net income. That percentage is then multiplied by the childcare costs, resulting from the father's share of the monthly childcare costs being calculated at $528. Connection of the other, the mother's share would be the difference between $800 and $528, which is $272. Schedule 1: The Statewide Child Support Guideline Family Code §4055 (a) The statewide uniform guideline for determining child support orders is as follows: CS = K (HN - (H%) (TN)). (b) The components of the formula are as follows:(A) CS = child support amount. (B) K = amount of both parents' income to be allocated for child support as set out in paragraph (3). (C) HN = high earner's net monthly disposable income. (D) H% = approximate percentage time the high earner has or will have primary physical responsibility for the children compared to the other parent. In cases where parents have different time-sharing arrangements for different children, H% equals the average of the approximate percentages of the time the high earner spends older with each child. (E) TN = total net monthly disposable income of both parties. (2) To calculate net disposable income, see Section 4059. (3) K (amount of both parents' income allocated for child support) is equal to one plus H% (if H% is less than or equal to 50 per cent) or two minus H% (if H% is greater than 50 per cent) that following fracture: fracture: fracture: fracture:
